High-performance tires are designed for optimum performance and handling in warm climates. When driving in cold, snowy or icy weather, you should change your vehicle with high all-season or winter tires, which offer better traction under these conditions. Your authorized Audi dealer can help you with this important replacement. While high-performance tires are designed for a variety of climates, they do not perform well in ice and snow. Your authorized Audi dealer can help you with this important replacement. It is important to carefully observe all posted speed limits and driving conditions under these circumstances.

Tire pressure: For optimum performance, you should use the recommended pressure for your vehicle. Please check your owner’s manual for more information. Once you are sure that your tires are inflated to the recommended pressure, you should check the pressure of your tires weekly.

Remember that high-performance tires are designed to deliver responsive handling, but this may result in increased noise levels and a more pronounced road feel. These tires are also designed to deliver optimum performance and handling.

2 Even with high-quality tires, you must always drive in a manner appropriate for the terrain, visibility and road conditions, and you must maintain a safe distance from other vehicles. Driving aggressively will increase tire wear and may not deliver the performance and handling expected.
